

Tool Box Talk

Mind On Safety

Report It, Don't Ignore It

Anything you encounter on the worksite that gives you a feeling of "That's not safe at all" should be reported immediately. Don't just put your head down and keep walking, hoping that someone else will report it.

The same philosophy should also be used in respect to reporting near misses – a near miss could be the next accident.

Everyone in the workplace is responsible for their own safety and the safety of their co-workers. This is the foundation of the Internal Responsibility System.

For more info on the Internal Responsibility System:
<https://www.ccohs.ca/oshanswers/legisl/legislation/irs.html>

Keep Your Mind On The Task

Anyone working in Saskatchewan can understand what a challenge it is to get the job done when working against the elements.

Heat, wind and extreme cold are only a few of the conditions we face every year. It may be easier said than done to keep your mind on the job when it's +34 degrees Celsius, but it's very important to keep a clear mind and remember to use your safe job procedures and personal protective equipment.

On a different note, we all have personal lives and personal issues to deal with that can easily affect our mindset.

At times, it can be difficult not to think about these matters and let our minds wander when performing our daily jobs and responsibilities. If you are not focused on your task and how to do it safely, you and your co-workers are at risk for an accident to occur.

Thinking about the weekend, daydreaming, beeping cell phones, or just not paying attention are other factors that could lead to an accident or fatality.

Always Look For Hidden Hazards

While you are on-site, working conditions are always changing, and so will the hazards.

These could be unexpected hazards that you may not typically encounter, so be aware of the changes around you. These can include workers who don't see you enter their hazardous work area, low-overhead pipes that may cause a head injury, unmarked floor openings and poor housekeeping that could result in slips, trips, and falls.

Keep your eyes open and your mind on safety.